QustodioRisk factors for pressure ulcer development in pediatric and neonatal intensive care units. This study was designed to identify risk factors for development of pressure ulcers in children who were admitted to pediatric and neonatal intensive care units. The study population was comprised of children who were admitted to pediatric intensive care units and neonatal intensive care units from July 1997 to March 2000. A total of 8,174 patients were enrolled, and 2,321 had pressure ulcers develop. The mean age of the patients was 39.3 days. Pressure ulcers were located on the head in 534 (6.4%), neck in 26 (0.3%), buttocks in 114 (1.4%), upper extremities in 264 (3.1%), lower extremities in 405 (4.8%), and multiple locations in 26 (0.3%). Risk factors for pressure ulcer development included the following: length of hospitalization, presence of long-term catheterization, total days of antibiotic treatment, and total days of bladder catheterization. These risk factors are similar to those for adult intensive care unit patients, and this may mean that the care of pediatric intensive care unit patients and neonatal intensive care unit patients is not adequately designed to prevent the development of pressure ulcers. In addition, it was found that all of the 638 patients with a moderate or severe risk of developing a pressure ulcer developed a pressure ulcer. This study provides strong evidence that the care of children in intensive care units should be improved to prevent the development of pressure ulcers. The following is an excerpt from Randy Newman's new book, Let's Get Small: A Musical Pilgrimage. A group of people have been converging in the hills of southwestern Georgia for nearly a century. They converge

2017, they gathered to enjoy some of the great music that Georgia has to offer. For these musicians and their friends, family, and fans, that music is deeply intertwined with the place. Toccoa Falls, in particular, has hosted such lumin
